Cracking the fortress: can we really decolonize psychology?

Editorial

Suntosh R Pillay

It so happens that the unpreparedness of the educated classes, the lack of practical links between them and the mass of people, their laziness, and let it be said, their cowardice at the decisive moment of the struggle will give rise to tragic mishaps.

Frantz Fanon (1963, p. 147), The Wretched of the Earth

A crack is the perfectly ordinary creation of a space or moment in which we assert a different type of doing.

John Holloway (2010, p. 21), Crack Capitalism

Is decolonization just the latest trendy buzzword and a lofty aspiration that academics claim to do in their spare time? Why is Western psychology innocently labeled "psychology" but African psychology geographically located? Are the Black Consciousness theories of Frantz Fanon and Steve Biko routinely taught to students? These were some of the questions I posed at a plenary debate at the 22nd annual South African Psychology Congress held by the Psychological Society of South Africa (PsySSA) in Johannesburg in September 2016. I wondered aloud whether our research dissertations ever actually create real change for the populations studied, or merely provide us a ticket into the profession. The audience laughed as I cracked this self-reflective "joke" but, as I paused for silent spaces, I hoped that by turning the mirror on ourselves, my peers realized that the joke was sadly on us. My intention in asking these questions was to enhance "the revolutionary potential of small-scale resistances" (Cornish, Haaken, Moskovitz, & Jackson, 2016, p. 116).

How did it come to be that a field of inquiry, whose primary purposes are to understand and benefit people, fails so miserably at both? Psychologists directly and indirectly facilitated the oppression of Black people and colluded with the illegitimate apartheid regime (Nicholas &
